Connecting With Kids 9/10/03

Obesity among children and adolescents in the United States is skyrocketing. According to surveys conducted by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, 15% of American children are obese, 30% are classified as overweight. The rate of obesity has nearly tripled since the 1970s. The rise in childhood obesity has also been linked to a disturbing increase in cases of Type 2 diabetes, once known as adult onset diabetes. Pediatricians also report increases in hypertension and heart disease among children.

Why are American teenagers gaining so much weight? Put simply, experts say, kids are eating more and exercising less. Fast food, processed food, video games, computers, TV, easy transportation—all have in the blame for this current epidemic.

New research at St. Louis University also points to a physiological cause for obesity.

Studies on laboratory animals reveal a 'short circuit' in the brains of obese mice, which prevents them from knowing when they have eaten enough. The lead researcher says it's important for parents to help their children avoid becoming obese in the first place, before this 'blood-brain barrier' occurs.

For many children, the problems caused by obesity are not just physical. "It affects how you interact with other people," pediatric dietician Marilyn Tanner says. "It affects relationships." The big hurt for many kids is the almost constant teasing and taunting they have to endure. Ask 15-year-old Tony Parisi, who is 5'6" and weighs 299 pounds. "It's inhumane," he says, "what some kids will do to you."

How can parents help? The key, experts say, is to stay involved with their children in terms of diet and exercise. Be supportive—and be prepared to change your own lifestyle as well. "It's not, 'what are we going to have at that holiday meal?' It's, 'what are we going to do at that event,'" Marilyn Tanner says. "Instead of thinking, what's our food going to be like? It should be, what's our activity going to be? You know, sort of refocusing the whole family."
